FOUR ACES AGAINST FOUR KINGS. Last Friday morning a Mr. Lindsey arrived at Cincinnati from Louisville minus a hundred or two dollars, which he bet on four kings and lost, his opponent holding the four 'spots." The Cincinnati Gazette tells the story, which we copy: "The evening previous to the arrival of the boat he was invited into the saloon to take a hand at a small game of poker just for amuse-ment.' Thinking that the time would pass less heavily, and that the ante would be small, and consequently he could not possibly change much money, he concluded to accept a seat at the table. The others of the party were Otis Forrester and Daniel Ward, individuals who 'travel for game,' but whom Mr. Lindsey took to be business men. The 'keerds' run about even for a time, nether party getting much the advantage, and the game appeared to be really one for amusement only. "Presently Mr. Lindsey 'raised' his hand, as the cards were dealt to him, and one king followed another until he held four crowned heads! There was but one other hand in the pack could beat his, and that was four aces. By this time the Mound City gentleman had got to be a little loser, so he resolved to make up his loss and something over on his 'big hand.' He bet cautiously at first, just to draw on his opponents, who finally him almost out of his boots by putting up money to the amount of $102, which Mr. Lind sey was required to cover. He did so, although it very nearly 'sized his pile,' not entertaining the slightest suspicion but that he should 'rake down' the funds and enjoy a good laugh at his new-found friends. What was his astonishment-to draw the description very mildly—to find that Forrester was lucky enough to hold the only hand in the deck that could beat his own-the invincible four aces! "The Mound City gentleman was no fool, though he exhibited a slight degree of verdancy in sitting down to play cards with sharpers, and as the stakes were swept off the table he began to smell a large-sized mice. and, after making an inquiry or two about his new friends, the animal, tail and all, was fully developed. He was satisfied that he had been plucked by sharpers, and swore out a warrant againt both Ward and Forrester for grand larceny, and they were required to give bonds in $300 to appear for examination on Thursday next, when the question will be determined whether even four aces can't be beat, when played against the 'hand' of police court justice. |Subsequently both Forrester and Ward were arrested, charged with being common gamblers, and also with being vagrants.pon both these charges they were held to bail to appear and be tried.]
